Abstract

Armenia is the only neighbor of Iran with the majority of Christian people who have been intimate relations with Iran since independence. The two ancient Iranian and Armenian peoples have had widespread political, social, cultural, and economic cooperation from far-flung past. These close connections have rooted in the cultural, civilizational, and traditional values of two great nations that have been able to cooperate with each other for centuries, along with ethnic, religious, and religious differences. The friendly cooperation between Iran and Armenia in the current context, given its background in the past, can continue to expand in the cultural, social, economic and political dimensions of today, and the appropriate framework for sustainable development through the development of friendly relations between the two countries and even improving relations Iran will provide with other countries. In other words, from the point of view of political and social experts, the sincere engagement of Iran and Armenia as two Islamic and Christian countries can be a good model for relations between Iran and other nations and nations with different religions, especially in the Eurasian region.
